

MORNING APPEAL

SATURDAY.....MARCH 31

I. P. Fisher, newspapers advertising agent, 21 Merchants' Exchange, San Francisco, is our authorized agent. This paper is kept on file in his office.

A VICTIM OF OVER-PRODUCTION.

Once there was a great scribe. He was full of years and wisdom, and the people pointed at him and said: "Behold, he knoweth everything." And after many years had flown it came to pass that the scribe said to himself: "It is true I am very wise. I may not know all that is to be known, but very little has escaped me." And he marveled at his exceeding wisdom, and rubbed his hands in glee. And behold there came a time of suffering upon the land, and men were so stricken with want, and trouble and sorrow laid its hand heavily upon them. Mothers sat in grief and watched their children die; little babes cried aloud for bread to ears that heard them not, or to those who could not heed. Men stole and fought and rioted, in wild rebellion against these things, and women sold themselves. So it came to pass that the poor were sore stricken, and the rich did sympathize with them greatly. The demon of Hunger stretched forth his gnawing claw and destroyed, with none to say him nay.

So the people turned one to the other, and said "Why must this be?"

"The land is fair and the husbandman reapeth abundantly, yet we go hungry."

"The cities groan with wealth, but we share it not."

"From dawn till dusk have we toiled faithfully for many weary years, but now we have no food; the cold wind bites through our thin clothing, and we are driven from our homes." And they said one to another: "Why?" But no one could answer them.

Then one among them said: "Let us ask the scribe; perchance of his knowledge he hath a remedy for this grievous evil."

So they gathered together in a band and went to the place where the scribe was writing; and he was bent over a parchment entitled, "The Grandeur of Our Industrial Institution." And they were silent and filled with awe at the sight of so much knowledge. And when some time had passed, one of the band made bold to approach the scribe and speak to him, and he said: "Oh thou wise man, tell us, if thou canst, why we must suffer."

And the scribe said: "I will write about it, and you may read."

And then he who had spoken said: "Then, tell us, is there no relief for us? Must our hunger be always unsatisfied, and our nakedness unclothed?" And the scribe answered him and said: "It will be always, and perchance worse."

And then those who had come to speak unto the scribe withdrew.

And as they passed from the portals of the scribe's mansion, a beggar came and sat him down by the door to beg. And he was very hungry, and his garments were tattered and rent; and he sat by the door and asked alms.

And the scribe wrote: "The great evil that has come upon us is caused by overproduction."

And the day waned and the beggar sat at the door.

And the scribe wrote: "There is too much wealth created; the people cannot absorb it."

And night came, and still the great and wise scribe sat with his pen and wrote and wrote. And he showed the unthinking multitude that it was necessary to place a tariff upon jewels and precious stones, and they must also select for their leader one who was his personal friend. And he wisely suggested that a certain Prince and Princess might be married and an allowance granted them from the state, and in this way much of their suffering could be alleviated.

And midnight came, and the scribe finished his wonderful explanation of their misery. And the people shook their heads one to the other and said: "I told you so."

And the scribe spent the night feasting in company with a dancing girl.

And when morning came the beggar had starved.—By Mark E. Swan.
